V, v /viː/.
The twenty-second letter of the modern English alphabet and the twentieth of the ancient Roman one, of which U is a differentiated form. Orig. an adoption of the early Greek vowel symbol V, now also represented by U and Y, it also represented in Latin a semi-vocalic sound /w/ (corresp. to the Greek digamma) which gradually changed to a bilabial /β/ and later a labiodental /v/ consonant. English use of V first became established in Middle English under French influence, but without a formal distinction of use from U, with which it continued to share the functions of representing both a vowel and a consonant until about 1700 (see U, u) before being regularly distinguished as the consonant. The sound now normally represented by the letter is a voiced labiodental fricative consonant. Pl. V's, Vs. See also VEE.

V

Ww

W, w /ˈdʌb(ə)ljuː/.
The twenty-third letter of the modern English alphabet, originating from a ligature of the Roman letter represented by U and V of modern alphabets. The sound normally represented by the letter is the bilabial semi-vowel /w/, closely resembling the value of Roman consonantal U or V. The sound was at first represented by uu, but in Old English and early Middle English the runic character wynn was widely used, this in turn being replaced in Middle English by the ligature w. Consonantal w is now silent initially and medially before r and may be silent before h (see WH) and (in some words as answer, sword, two) after s and t. It may also be elided in the unstressed 2nd elem. of a compound, as in place names (Norwich) and in certain nautical terms (forward, gunwale). Vocalic w results from the Middle English mutation of g and y (cf. YOGH) and medially and terminally forms a digraph with the preceding stressed vowel (as in bow); also from Middle English w was freq. used instead of u as 2nd elem. of other digraphs (as in paw, yew). Pl. W's, Ws.

▸I 1 The letter and its sound.
2 The shape of the letter.

▸II Symbolical uses.
